Resolving team disputes

What’s visible and what lies beneath often differ. A visitor to your work area might perceive a congenial work team operating smoothly. However, as a leader you may be well aware of underlying conflicts between certain team members.

Whether it’s a process dispute, turf war or basic interpersonal disagreement, conflict can sour the work environment and hamper productivity.

- While it’s best to encourage employees to self-sufficiently work out issues on their own, sometimes this isn’t possible and you need to step in as a mediator.
- As the supervisor, remain objective and don’t take sides. For example, establish a group meeting at a neutral location instead of meeting individually with differing parties. This way you’re a facilitator rather than a judge.
- Have each party describe their perspective of the conflict. Ask clarifying questions (e.g., “Can you say more about that?”) to drill down to the crux of the conflict.
- Require that each participant identify specific actions that could potentially resolve the differences.
- Formulate and document a mutually agreed upon plan for a solution, and set a date to check in and review progress.

Insist on integrity and respect

☑ When meeting to resolve a conflict, set ground rules that require respectful behavior. Remind participants to control their emotions and treat others as they would like to be treated.

☑ Act quickly if conflict becomes harassment. If a problem appears driven by gender, race or sexual orientation issues, intervene immediately. Ask your human resources department to assist.

☑ Supervisors should lead by example: treat each team member as a valued, respected member of the organization.

According to recent research, managers spend about 35% of their time dealing either directly or indirectly with workplace conflicts. So, expect disagreements—and implement resolution strategies before conflicts escalate.
Confront conflict, move the team forward

While a leader’s natural inclination may be to avoid conflicts due to the inherent anxiety and uncertainty, confronting conflict can actually lead to process improvements and innovation.

- Avoiding conflict essentially equals avoiding change—which is futile in today’s workplace. The comfortable status quo isn’t positive for any organization.
- It’s important to learn how to manage conflict effectively so it serves as a catalyst, rather than a drag, on group performance.
- Considering a new point of view—an opportunity to reconsider the old—can help generate new processes or organizational ideas that haven’t been previously identified.
- You can successfully address and resolve even long-simmering misunderstandings, leading to better long-term group cohesion.
- Those who have dealt with workplace conflict demonstrate a higher understanding of their colleagues, improved working relationships, and better solutions to problems or challenges.
- When facilitating conflict resolution, use positive language to express your confidence that your team can reach a workable solution.
