

MAY IS MENTAL HEALTH MONTH

ADAPTING AFTER TRAUMA AND STRESS

We all face trauma, adversity and other stresses throughout our lives. When people think of trauma, they often think of things like abuse, terrorism or catastrophic events. Traumas can also be caused by events that are less obvious, but still overwhelm your ability to deal with them, such as frequent arguing at home or losing your job. Traumas of any kind can affect your mental health but working to become more resilient can help you feel better.

Process your thoughts. During and after trauma, it is common to switch into survival mode and have no energy to wrap your head around what has happened. It may feel safest to bury painful feelings and avoid confronting them but recognizing what has happened and how it has affected you is one of the healthiest things you can do.

Connect with people. A support system is an important part of well-being. Emotional support helps us feel less alone or overwhelmed by what has happened in our lives. Talking to someone who has had a similar experience, or someone who cares for you, can be an affirmation - and help you cope better with the challenges you face.

Do not compare your experiences with those of others. We often question our own thoughts or experiences, and you can convince yourself that what you have experienced was not a big deal because "others have it worse." Everyone experiences a trauma differently, and no trauma is "worse" than the other. If it hurts you, then it hurts you - and your feelings and experiences are valid.

MAY IS MENTAL HEALTH MONTH

ADAPTING AFTER TRAUMA AND STRESS

Take care of your body. Stress and trauma affect your body and your physical health as well as your mind. Listening to your body and giving it what it needs will help you heal. This includes a nutritious diet, sufficient sleep and regular exercise. Moving your body every day, even if it is just a few minutes of stretching, is particularly helpful in healing trauma.

Know it will take time. There is no predetermined timetable for "healing." Remove the pressure to get back on your feet quickly and focus on taking one step at a time. Remember: recovery is not linear, and it is normal to have bad days and setbacks. It doesn't mean you fail - it's just part of the process.

Treat yourself with compassion. Dealing with trauma and stress is not an easy task, and it is common to be frustrated with yourself and what can sometimes be a slow recovery process. Try to catch when you are holding yourself to unreasonable standards - instead of angrily asking, "Why am I doing this?" Remember how impressive it is that you are continuing despite what you have experienced.

Don't be ashamed to ask for help. It is easy to compare how you feel, and how you assume that others who have had similar experiences feel, and you may get down on yourself because everyone else seems to be doing well. What others experience and how they deal with it does not matter on your journey - if you feel that you need or want help, it is important to get it as soon as possible.

Source: Mental Health America
www.mhanational.org/mental-health-month

EAP is here to provide you with compassionate and caring support.
Go online to eap.calhr.ca.gov or call 1-866-327-4762 to get started.